benefits are conservation of a natural economic resource, the introduction of an enormous amount of capital into the State through visiting sportsmen, and the forcing of a destructive host of idlers out of the fields during the hunting season. As soon as game becomes bountiful in a State sportsmen buy lands, build clubhouses, employ wardens, dog trainers, and many others to work for them. Whole sections in other States have been built up and enriched in this way just because game was abundant and product of the introduction of success by friction among those interested in the general issue. To the Editor of The Times-Dispatch: Sir,-In the country districts, where in the fields to working on the land. These idlers comprise an army in Virginia, and would be compelled to follow a legitimate pursuit if their hunting grounds were taken from them. One thing is certain—they would never pay for a hunting license, and even if they had one they would be unable to secure permission to hunt on other people's land. The benefits which would flow to agriculturists if these hundreds of loafers were forced to work would not be second to the value of the birds themselves. The law would disarm not less than 10,000 so-called hunters who for months each year contribute nothing to the State nor to their own communities, and who are an actual curse to landowners.

No. The time has come when he who hunts must pay something for the a considerable number of voters reside, who hunts must pay something for the whole community, and to settle into
